The Northern Group of the Eastern Carpathians distinguishes itself through an attractive touristic potential, both anthropic as well as natural. The wooden churches and monasteries of Bucovina belong to the antropical heritage, while the landscape to the natural one, developed on a diversified lithological basis (eruptive rocks in the West, crystalline in the middle and sedimentary in the East).

To all these on can add the unaltered human potential and theremarkable hospitality of the inhabitants.

Three types of areas, regarding the tourist organization of space, have been highlighted based on the variety and level of the touristic potential, of the role in its development and its exploitation forms: areas with a complex organization, areas with a deficient organization, areas in the process of organizing themselves.
